Further notes on population projections:

* All population projections are necessarily rough estimates that are meant to provide a reasonable forecast for citywide population growth. Individual small area (e.g. community/ward) forecast distributions are inherently less reliable, particularly in situations where either the timing or type of development does not match the forecast assumptions. Specific small area forecasts that appear to be realistic for individual areas may be incorporated into the projected distributions as they become available. Similarly, splitting the population forecast for each individual small area into different age categories also results in rough estimates. The age categories contain numerous additional assumptions including but not limited to: historical demographic profiles, community lifecycle trends, age of communities, MDP typologies, etc. It is important to recognize that the resulting population projections represent one possible scenario for the future based on the assumptions that have been made. These assumptions and forecasts are updated regularly as more information is available.
